The Danbury News says: A local florist had a great shock on Saturday afternoon when he entered the work-room of his place and gazed upon a floral plece that lay on a counter finished and ready for delivery. In telling the story this morning he said he had been surprised at a great many things in his business, but nothing had ever had just the same effect upon him as had the incident he related. He had a floral plece made up and set a boy employed in the place at the task of forming letters of covered wire

Bacilli, microbes, germs and just plain bugs are again seriously menacing Waterbury. This time, according to the board of health, they are holding their big meetings and conventions in milk cans and milk bottles. The grms are whisked into the milk cans by the cow's tail and by the shifting of the cow's hoofs, but this can be remedied. At the meeting of the board this week, Dr. Charles Engelke suggested strapping down the hoofs and tying down the tail. A safer plan, however, the health officer thought, was to have a bacterlological examination of milk samples. Dr. Engelke was instructed to investigate the systems in vogue in other cities report, "four out of five times you will find sediment at the bottom of the bottles. While the samples may have the requisite percentage of butter fats and solids, few are up to the standard of cleanliness.
